FISH NOTES.

What the Various Anglers are Doing.

The party of young sports who went up to Hope Valley last week haven't caught a fish to date. They took one fish pole, twelve decks of cards, a bag of poker chips and plenty of the where-with-all.

They all expect to be broke, but one man in a few days.

Jack Furlong went over to Washoe lake to fish a few days ago and wandered up to Marlett lake instead, his team losing the way. He had no permit from the Company, and will be out again as soon as he picks the No. 6 bird shot out of his legs.

Sam Chamberlain, managing editor of the Examiner, sent us a large string of fish last evening.

They were marked "trout," but proved to be suckers, and somewhat rank at that.

Sam is from New York, and never heard of a trout before he came West. He purchased the string of a boy who caught them near the Tallac House.

President Harrison writes us from Cape May that the fishing is good and to come out at once.

Harrison has told such yarns on the silver question that we are inclined to doubt his fish stories.

The Salton Desert Flood.

The water of the great desert lake in California have commenced to recede, and it is thought it will continue to do so until the lake disappears entirely.

A dispatch from Los Angeles says: The party sent out by the Southern Pacific Company last week to find the source of the desert lake at Salton has returned and reports that the water leaves the Colorado river eight miles from El Rio, and flows through several channels to Aroyo Mucho station, where they join, making a stream 150 yards wide and having a velocity of four miles an hour. The water is too deep to be measured. At Alamo Mucho, 52 miles from the river, the stream enters the desert for Salton. This settles conclusively the source of the water.

Kelly Understands.

Three years ago, Allan Kelly, a young journalist, spent six months in the Sierra Madre in order to catch a grizzly for the Examiner. The brute that he finally trapped was full grown and weighed 1,600 pounds, and has been confined in a small cage at Woodward's Gardens ever since.

The other day Kelly and the keepers started in to clip the bear's claws, which had overgrown and become twisted. The keepers were all for lariats and main strength, but the reporter said no. He had confidence in the intelligence of his savage captive. With peanuts and bananas the newspaper man fed the grizzly until the beast became grateful and amiable. Then the bear, able with one wipe of his tremendous paw to kill any man, allowed Kelly to pare his claws with a blacksmith's nippers. The keepers, accustomed all their lives to deal with wild animals, were astounded and the respect they have for that reporter's nerve is greater than a front street merchant for a Bulletin editorial.—Arther McEwing.
